Q: Getting tiles from background job at the right time In my app I am using the Google Maps background job API to get realtime updates on a tile server in the background and set them on the map. To do this I get a callback when a tile has been replaced by the server and update the map accordingly. However I noticed that I have to request a new callback about twice the regular rate as google state: Normally, a tile position update is requested once every 60 seconds. The normal polling rate to retrieve tile position updates is 2/seconds. For example, at 20/seconds, a polling request is requested every 100 milliseconds. Is there any way to handle such an issue as well? A: You can put tile updates into a queue and process them in batches. As long as you set a reasonably large queue size, you should be ok. It is also possible that you will be requested to update a tile twice within a single second, you'll just get a handler for both requests. From what I've seen, running the background job asynchronously and in a single task can reduce the rate at which you get tile updates to 50-100ms. USA, Canada, Poland, UK, Singapore, and Malaysia.
