Q: Should I wait to start new job when I'm unemployed? I'm in the process of applying for several jobs. I have a notice period (say, 30 days) before they decide on whether I'm hired. I know some people suggest that you have to start the job (even if you're an unemployed applicant) to get a head start on things like expenses, first pay checks, etc. Is there any benefit to doing this or is it just a matter of using the free time you have to negotiate a better salary, benefits, etc? A: My first job was after I got laid off from my last job. My wife (who was also applying for jobs) was required to start on the first day of her first job, so she was also unemployed for almost a year. If you're unemployed and they give you the job offer before the notice period is up, you'll already have the advantage of the job. So I wouldn't call it a "free time to negotiate better salary, benefits, etc." Also, since you don't have an obligation to accept the job offer, you'll have more negotiating power if you're already employed. A: If you are employed on the 1st day, you should expect to get a wage that is at least equal to what you would get now. You will have that advantage in negotiation. You will also have the advantage of knowing what the environment is like at your current workplace and the surrounding environments and will know what the future possibilities might be. You will also have time to adjust to the environment and know how to be a good employee.
