I have a scenario where I want users to queue tasks to be processed. I want the highest priority tasks to be processed first. Right now, there is a single queue with the highest priority (0). A user can only consume a single message at a time, but once the first message is consumed, it is no longer considered a "high priority" and moves down in the queue. If the task requires I/O like query of a database or database call, it will block on the message and prevent the queue from receiving any more tasks. I can see a couple ways of working around this: Wait for the message to arrive and delete the message. Add a second message (of lower priority) to the queue, and keep processing the lower priority messages in the order they arrive, and move the higher priority messages in order they arrive. Once the higher priority message is processed, I will delete the lower priority message and return to processing the higher priority messages in order. I'm fairly new to Azure Service Bus, and don't know if there is a way to automatically keep a queue with the highest priority, and have each message be processed in order of arrival.
