I am currently working on a piece of code that needs to save a lot of data into the Azure Cache. I was wondering if I would be better off simply calculating the cost once per day, and then once per month (and possibly billing for that). In other words, would Azure Pricing Calculator be able to accurately calculate the cost of the service if you were to count on it to take into account how much data is being used in cache? A: As others have stated, the cost calculator does not take into account current usage. However, with a "retention policy", you can set the frequency at which the data is flushed to blob storage and emptied from cache. You can also set the frequency of cache refreshes so that you are not getting hit with an update every time. Example: Retention Policy: 1 hour Cache Refresh: 10 minutes Store Delete Cache Policy: 10 minutes In this case, your cache update would occur every hour, but you would be charged for every 10 minutes, since you are accumulating 10 minutes of cache data. However, if your retention policy was set to "Always, regardless of usage", then your cache data would be cleared every 10 minutes and you would only be charged for the time you are actually using the cache. Retention policies can be found under the service properties. Q: show nav bar when I hover at any other area of the page I have a nav bar with the logo in the middle and on the left and right side I have 4 menus. I would like to when I hover my mouse on each menu I want that nav bar to appear. Is there any way I can do that? A: You can do it with pure css: .navbar { position: fixed; top: 0; z-index: 1001; } if you're using bootstrap I believe this should do it: .navbar { position: fixed; top: 0; z-index: 1001;

Title: Sensación. Album: H. Does the Chinese national food guide serve the health needs of the older Chinese population? National food guides have been used by many nations to determine the food needs of their populations. In China, the food guide recommendations are based on the 1960s food guide (the Yang Shang Bi Jing) which has been widely implemented in the urban areas, but not in the rural areas. Therefore, the purpose of this study was to compare the adequacy of food intake in the Chinese elderly population and their current food intake with the Chinese food guide and US food guide recommendations. We also compared the current food intake of the subjects with both the food guide recommendations and the Healthy Eating Index (HEI). There was no significant difference between the food guide recommendation and the HEI for the US population. However, the HEI was not adequate for the Chinese population. The Chinese food guide recommendation was also not adequate for the Chinese elderly, and the HEI was not sufficient. Therefore, it is suggested that the Yang Shang Bi Jing food guide should be replaced with the 2009 Chinese food guide. ♦?t have to. See how easily they fall into the the rut of complaining when they can't have everything and being lazy when they find that a little exercise is just as good for them? Don't think that someone who claims to be a Christian can't be allowed to buy the Universe

Sucks color contest. I personally think that it is a shame to deny them the chance. Lori I'm not saying I didn't need the exercise yesterday. It was, I'm pretty sure, the furthest distance I've walked since I started working out again. I was a bit tired, however. And I've been working out again. Today I did a little yoga. Still haven't stepped on the scale, but I know I'm not lighter, which is the only number I care about anyway. This is sort of a follow-up to the other comment about time management. I mentioned that I probably do have more time than I think I do, but I have made the mistake of thinking that I will never have to put more time into cleaning and organizing my house, for example. This
