A: As others have said in the comments, there are multiple ways of solving this. Here are some of them: Create a simple crawler in one language and use it to extract data. Create a simple crawler in one language and use a web service in another language to import data into your database. Create a php script that communicates with your DB and does the data import. The first and third options can be done in php, python, java, ruby and other languages as well. Successful treatment of cyclophosphamide-induced renal damage in a dog by forced diuresis. Cyclophosphamide, a chemotherapeutic agent used to treat cancer, damages the renal tubules and can cause uremia. The pathophysiology of cyclophosphamide-induced uremia is complex. Early and accurate diagnosis of tubular damage is essential in order to prevent irreversible kidney damage. An 11-year-old female greyhound was presented to the hospital with a 10-day history of weight loss, vomiting, anorexia, and lethargy. Urine dipstick analysis revealed hematuria. Renal ultrasound examination revealed a dilated urinary tract filled with a large quantity of a straw-colored, granular material, which was consistent with urate renal casts. Hematology and serum biochemistry analysis revealed severe hyperphosphatemia, azotemia, leukocytosis, and hyperbilirubinemia. Cytology of a urine specimen obtained by cystocentesis revealed numerous nucleated red blood cells. A diagnosis of cyclophosphamide-induced hematuria was made. Cyclophosphamide was discontinued and the dog was treated with forced diuresis by insertion of an indwelling urethral catheter. After 24 hours of forced diuresis, the hematologic and biochemical parameters had returned to baseline.
