Histopathology of female accessory sex gland tumors (AGSTs) continues to pose challenges. Currently, the diagnosis of AGSTs is based on their histological features and their similarities to benign (Warthin's) and malignant (endometrioid) uterine neoplasms. There are no specific histological features to distinguish benign AGSTs from their malignant counterparts. Given that most AGSTs are associated with endometriosis and that their tumor cells typically express estrogen and progesterone receptors, we investigated whether histological features can be used to differentiate benign AGSTs from endometrioid AGSTs. We reviewed histological features of AGSTs, including differentiation into secretory, mixed, and endometrioid types
