It is particularly directed to a method and apparatus for separating glass sheets which are conveying at a relatively high rate of speed. In the manufacture of glass sheets it is frequently necessary to separate one of the sheets from a stream of such sheets which is being conveyed past one or more processing stations. Such a glass sheet may have one or more defects and, as such, must be segregated from the others in the stream. It is desirable, of course, to carry out such segregating at a high rate of speed and, in the past, this has been achieved by a variety of devices. One of the problems encountered with the high speed segregation of glass sheets is the creation of a nip by the impact of a second glass sheet on the first as it is conveyed by a relatively high speed conveyor. The second sheet must be segregated while the impact force is imparted at a point sufficiently high to withstand the shock created by the high speed conveyor. In addition, if the impact is too severe, the glass may be cracked and thereby damage the surface.
