Kaggle Data Science Notebooks, since they appear to use data from the Open Data site, are another option. 2. Using machine learning software There are several packages and frameworks for doing machine learning (in machine learning, "machine learning" is a general term referring to the application of statistical models to data to predict phenomena). The packages can be found using your IDE's Package Manager and/or a search engine, or you can find them here: In R, e.g., you can use: `library(RWeka) lm(Res~Word,data=Eve)` In Python, you can use: `import sklearn lm(y=y, X=X, method="svm")` In Matlab, you can use: `[lm fit]` In C++, you can use: `#include ... boost::char_separator charsep(","); boost::tokenizer > tokens(string_of_macro, charsep); boost::tie(begin, end) = boost::make_tuple(tokens.begin(), tokens.end()); boost::algorithm::split(begin, end, macros);` Another option (which is easy to use in R, but not so easy in Python or C++): `data = eval(parse(text="foo, bar"))` 3. Using a mathematical library There are a number of mathematical libraries that you can use to solve problems in statistics. One of the most widely used is called statsmodels, which can be used in Python: `import statsmodels.api as sm model = sm.OLS(y, x) model.fit()` You can find more libraries and support in The Comprehensive World of Mathematical Software. A: Data mining (Wikipedia) Wikipedia has a list of Data mining tools. Data mining tools are used to extract meaningful information from a dataset. Machine learning is one of the ways to extract the meaning of the data. Machine Learning
