Field of the Invention The present invention relates to a polypeptide, and particularly to human polypeptide comprising a peptide as an active substance. 2. Description of the Background Art The peptide, called "enkephalin", is isolated as an extract obtained by the enzymatic hydrolysis of bovine adrenal medullary tissue, and the existence of enkephalin in the brain was revealed by Fujino et al. (Science, 230, 145, 1985). It was found in the central nervous system that enkephalin is a neurotransmitter. An enkephalin analog is an opioid that is activated when bound to a protein with high affinity for opioid. A pentapeptide (FGGF) specifically binds to this protein and, in consequence, exhibits an opioid activity. The endorphin is a peptide produced in endocrine cells. Endorphin and analogs thereof are known to bind to endogenous opioid receptors in the brain and the spinal cord, and to cause the release of opiates such as noradrenaline. Endogenous opioid activity is not necessarily involved in the production of endorphins, but is suggested to serve a regulatory function for the production of endorphins. The action mechanism of the endogenous opioid peptides is believed to be mediated by an enzyme called "endogenous opioid peptidase" (hereinafter, referred to as "EOP"). This EOP degrades endogenous opioid peptides, and was originally discovered as a proteolytic enzyme that cleaves tetorphan to form tetra-Gly-Lys. The sequence of the amino acid residue of a peptide which is cleaved by the enzyme has been shown to have a high homology with the sequence of the 4th and 6th amino acid residues of enkephalin. It was also found that this EOP was a glycoprotein. It was therefore suggested that this enzyme regulates the concentration of endogenous opioid peptides or enkephalins
