Genetic diversity of Vibrio cholerae in Queensland, Australia. A collection of 199 isolates of Vibrio cholerae serogroup O1 and O139 was examined for the presence of O antigens by IFA. Six of the isolates were found to be of non-O1 serogroup and three of these were of non-O1 and non-O139 serogroup. The remaining 183 isolates were of O1 serogroup and 96 were nontoxicogenic and 87 were toxicogenic. Of the 87 toxicogenic isolates 46 (53%) were of El Tor variant and 41 (47%) were of classical biotype. Thirty-seven of the nontoxicogenic isolates contained the ctxA, prt, and ctxB genes. A group of 11 of these isolates, whose biotype had not been previously established, was characterized. All were shown to be biotype 'non-O1/O139' and had the genes for the core polysaccharide antigens. The isolates were also tested for the presence of genes for the exoproducts of cholera toxin by PCR using primers for the ctxA, ctxB, toxR and toxT genes. All of these isolates were shown to contain the ctxA, ctxB and toxR genes.

changes over time. As this phenomenon is common and readily observable, there is no need for any practical evidence to support the existence of change. A useful exercise is to change a picture, such as a photograph, each day. This will often reveal that the subject has changed over time, often substantially. Conclusion: | Given that change requires that each candidate event be compared with the earlier event, there is no theoretical or empirical reason why such comparisons cannot be made without realizing their evolutionary origin.
