In fact, it's a solution to do the same thing as Remote Desktop Connection, without the need to install a separate program on your host machine. Furthermore, you don't have to use another application to gain control of your remote machine, and you can do so via either direct IP connection or by using an email. This type of software is usually used to connect remotely for the purposes of performing minor adjustments, having limited interaction with your computer or for connecting to a local computer from another PC in order to backup data. Although the support documentation seems rather limited, the software seems to have a variety of tools in order to manage remote access in different ways. It's possible to connect to your machine with a password, or to provide your own one, as well as to switch to view-only mode. Remote Desktop Control allows you to connect to a remote PC using the following methods:

- Direct IP connection: Simply write its IP address in the Host IP field of the configuration window and you will be connected instantly.
- Direct connection by email: Send a request to an address you create in the Host Email field, along with the connection details (i.e. a password, user name and computer name). Note that a login to the host machine is not necessary to use the configuration tool. It's possible to access the configuration window even if you are not connected to the remote machine via a network. The remote control function is very intuitive, but the interface doesn't cover all possible settings and access features. Besides the settings available from the host machine, it is possible to allow the user permission to accept remote connections, send files and copy clipboard contents. Remote Desktop Control allows you to connect to remote computers and control their actions over a network, such as a LAN, WAN or the Internet. Unlike traditional connection methods, Remote Desktop Control allows you to log in without any host software installed. Furthermore, it does not need to be installed on both computers to be used. Therefore, it is more straightforward to use and is more effective. Remote Desktop Control allows administrators to control remote computers remotely through a secure channel, i.e. using the "Direct Connection" mode and a password. Thus, a connection to a remote machine is established to check if the user has been logged on, or not. Remote Desktop Control provides three different administrative modes. In admin mode, it connects to a remote host computer to control its actions through the "Direct Connection" feature. If the remote host is not logged in, the administrator is prompted to enter the remote host password. Once the password is validated, the host module is activated. Admin mode is the default mode of Remote Desktop Control. It can be invoked when adding a new host, or when no other mode is selected. LAN: Remote Desktop Control connects to a remote computer over a Local Area Network (LAN) directly via IP address. If the remote host is not logged in, the administrator is prompted to enter the remote host password. Once the password is validated, the host module is activated. Remote Desktop Control connects to the remote computer by sending a request to the remote host via email. WAN: Remote Desktop Control connects to a remote computer over the Internet using a secure channel. If the remote host is not logged in, the administrator is prompted to enter the remote host password. Once the password is validated, the host module is activated. Remote Desktop Control connects to the remote computer using an HTTP tunneling protocol. Internet: Remote Desktop Control connects to a remote computer over the Internet using a secure channel. If the remote host is not logged in, the administrator is prompted to enter the remote host password. Once the password is validated, the host module is activated. Remote Desktop Control connects to the remote computer using the Telnet protocol. On Windows 7, the installation process can be performed automatically by typing a shortcut on the desktop. Alternatively, Remote Desktop Control can be installed manually, whereupon the shortcut is created automatically. Remote Desktop Control is not a concern to the system's overall performance, since it leaves a small footprint in the resources usage area. We have not come across any issues throughout our evaluation. It may
