Last update: Friday, February 22, 2019Q: Use a Generic Form to insert data into a database I have an ASP.NET MVC 4 Application. I am trying to create a View that allows me to add data into a database from a generic form (form with model). I have followed the instruction in these two tutorials and I believe that I have followed each tutorial exactly except for one detail: the "Add a new item to the database" section in the first tutorial says: (4) Create a generic controller as a base controller and pass the objects to the AddViewModel method of the new controller. I have noticed that the intellisense suggests that Controller is a type of an object. This causes me to be uncertain of whether or not this works. I have named my controller Actionand my View Model action but not other controller. I have also noticed that the Add method in my controller Action has the same signature as the code in the tutorial. I have noticed that the tutorial advises that I define a method name Add within the AddviewModel Method, but I am not sure what this is and I have tried typing Add into the intellisense, but it is not found. Is the Add method a type of an object? What would be the best place to put it?
