Depressed mood predicts P300 latency in remitted major depressive disorder. Although previous studies have reported attentional deficits in patients with major depression, whether depressive mood is associated with attentional deficits in remitted major depression is unknown. Therefore, we examined event-related potential (ERP) components in an auditory oddball paradigm to evaluate the effects of depressive mood on attention in remitted patients with major depression. ERPs were recorded from 25 patients with major depression (unipolar and bipolar) and 25 age and sex-matched healthy controls during an auditory oddball task. We focused on P300 latency and amplitude, which were used as indices for attentional impairment. As a result, there was a significant difference in the P300 latency between the depressed and control groups. In addition, the P300 latency was significantly correlated with the Beck Depression Inventory-II (BDI) score in the patient group. Furthermore, we found that the P300 latency was significantly correlated with the BDI score in the patient group but not in the control group. Taken together, our study indicates that depressive mood might predict P300 latency in remitted major depression. The results from the present study suggest that executive function impairments associated with depressive mood may have a role in the pathogenesis of major depression.
