The app is divided into pages, and each page has a separate JavaScript file that contain a function that translate the page. The pages for Japanese and English can be, for example: And I want to translate from English to Japanese and Japanese to English. I know that I can use "i18n" for this kind of task. But I want to ask that, what are the best practices in this case? How to make translation functional. Are there any patterns for this kind of application? How do you make translation work when the script is loaded in each page? I'm confused because I've never done it before. A: The approach to make language translation work in your web application depend on a situation. If you only deal with the pages with both Japanese and English pages, you can create the language specific JavaScript file and all JavaScript files include the translation language file. If you want to separate the pages by language and you have some pages in one language, you need to create both pages and put them into two different directories, respectively. And your language specific JavaScript file should include the translation function. You can create the locale folders to share the language specific functionalities of JavaScript. A:
