What's New In Photoshop CS6?

Study: Drugs Linked to Becoming Maternal NEW YORK (AP) — Drugs taken by pregnant women or prescribed to their babies could be linked to a higher risk of developing autism, a new study suggests. The research published Thursday suggests the risk of autism increases if a mother was exposed to drugs while pregnant or if the pregnant woman was prescribed certain anti-depressants. Experts and women in the study noted that the effects of drugs on fetuses and children have not been well-established, and that the findings do not mean that drugs cause autism. The study involved as many as 1,100 mothers in Norway who were given mental health surveys. The researchers found that mothers who took at least one drug in the first three months of pregnancy were nearly 50 percent more likely to have a child with autism or a developmental disorder than mothers not taking any drugs during pregnancy. The study also found that mothers who took drugs after they gave birth were more likely to have children with autism or developmental disorders, but they did not have a higher risk than mothers who were not prescribed any drugs. The researchers suggested the link might be because mothers who took drugs may have needed to be treated for conditions that sometimes make children autistic. Kristine L. Pruksch, a psychologist at the University of Calgary in Canada, said it is not clear whether the mothers used the drugs for depression during pregnancy or after, but the chance of becoming depressed during pregnancy is higher if one was previously depressed. "The question is whether that's what actually is triggering autism or whether it's something else," Pruksch said. "It's very hard to tease out," said Mark Obert, a pediatrician at Johns Hopkins University and director of the school's Center for Autism and Pregnancy Research. "We think it's not really genetic. It's more about the mother's ability to be good and stay well and protect the child during this critical period." Dr. Diana Elkins, a psychologist at the University of Michigan, said the study reinforces the need for safe drugs for pregnant women and children. "We have good reason to be concerned with drugs in general," Elkins said. "And we should be aware of the emerging research on that topic." Elkins said if drugs are used to treat serious illnesses, doctors would be expected to prescribe the safest and most effective treatments for the mother and baby. The study also included mothers who were prescribed anti-dep
