Computer interface input, output and display have become a major portion of an interactive environment. The input devices and displays have increased dramatically in capabilities and sophistication. Further, the speed with which data can be presented and used by the interactive environment, has increased as well. As a result, computer users can expect and demand sophisticated and fast interactive systems to accommodate the increase in speed and capability of the computers and displays. Many devices or programs have been developed for displaying a number of fields of information on the display screen of a computer at the same time, so that a user can quickly view and select one or more fields of information. The fields may contain text, graphics, images, sound, and the like. An example of a display for a computer is a window with a number of text lines and images. As the user reads the text in the lines, he or she may switch to other lines for other information. To make such an interactive window display, a computer may display a number of fields or text lines, and the user may point to a field or text line and select it by clicking on it with a pointing device. A pointing device can be a mouse, trackball, or any other device known to the skilled user. In a typical windowed display, a limited number of text lines are displayed. The user may scroll the text lines up or down, to display more text. There is no visual display of the lines that have been scrolled out of view. As a result, after the user has scrolled the text lines of the window to the bottom of the window display, the user may not easily determine what text lines he or she has missed. Additionally, there is no visual display of the text lines after the user has scrolled the text lines of the window to the top of the window display. As a result, the user may not easily determine whether he or she has scrolled the text lines to the top of the window display or to the bottom of the window display. If the user has scrolled the window to the top of the window display, the user may not know whether the scrolled view of the text lines on the window display can be scrolled up one more line, to show one more text line, or whether this scroll will cause the computer to scroll the window display to the top of the window display. There is currently no visual way to display a limited number of text lines of a window display, to scroll some of the text lines of the window display, and then

What's New in the Photoshop CC 2015 Version 18?

During drilling operations, the earth strata are often encountered which, for various reasons, may cause the drill bit to become stuck in the earth's strata. This phenomenon is commonly referred to as "bit sticking." Bit sticking can occur in any portion of the borehole. It is preferable for the drill bit to become stuck as close to the surface as possible so that the drilling operation can be terminated. Many times, the drilling operation can be terminated by the use of a drilling mud (mud) circulated therethrough which has a higher density than the drilling mud in which the drilling tool is suspended. The density of the "liquid mud" is frequently determined by an inductive depth measuring device such as the mud pulse technique. If the drill bit becomes stuck in the formation which results in no mud flow therethrough, then the only means of withdrawing the drill bit from the formation is by use of a jarring tool, commonly referred to as a "kickoff" tool. This tool includes a piston movable through the drill pipe which is actuated by passing a fluid therethrough. This fluid actuates the piston, which, in turn, causes the piston to strike the end of the drill pipe to thereby generate a shock wave which propels the drill pipe and connected drill string upwardly. This shock wave is designed to sever the pipe near the top of the drill string, and thereby allow the drill string to be pulled out of the borehole. During bit sticking, it is important to rapidly terminate the operation and pull out the drill string as fast as possible, so as to prevent further penetration into the formation. In addition, the drill string must be pulled out of the formation before the formation becomes permanently damaged. In many instances, the drill string may become stuck above the bit. In this instance, the drill pipe must be severed at the upper end, and the drill string pulled upwardly. In certain circumstances, there may be a small degree of rotation of the drill string. The degree of rotation should be kept to a minimum. If the bit becomes stuck at a certain depth in the borehole, the drill pipe is divided at the upper end and the bottom end of the drill string is pulled upwardly. The drill bit is then attached to the bottom end of the drill string and the drill string is then reinserted into the borehole at a point adjacent the bit stuck therebelow. The drill bit is withdrawn from the formation and the bit sticking procedure is then repeated. The present invention is directed toward an
