Correlation of pre- and post-surgical MRI features with routine histological parameters of renal cell carcinoma. To determine the correlation of the pre- and post-surgical MRI features of renal cell carcinoma (RCC) to Fuhrman nuclear grade, histological tumor type and necrosis. T2-weighted MR images of 58 consecutive patients with RCC were retrospectively reviewed by a single observer who measured the size and location of the tumor, the presence of tumor necrosis, cystic necrosis and heterogeneous enhancement. The pre- and post-surgical diagnoses were reviewed by another observer. Histological sections were reviewed by a single histopathologist and the tumor types were recorded. Fifty-three of 58 tumors (91%) were correctly characterized by MRI, 30 (52%) were T2 hypointense, and 19 (33%) were heterogeneous in intensity. There was strong correlation between tumor size and the presence of necrosis ( $r=0.94$ ,  $p < 0.05$ ) and heterogeneous tumors were more likely to have necrosis than smaller or hypointense tumors ( $p < 0.05$ ). Almost all RCC tumors are visible on T2-weighted MR images and MRI can be used to exclude this diagnosis in patients with otherwise indolent renal masses. The pre- and post-surgical MRI appearances of RCC correlated with the size of the tumor and its presence of necrosis, but not with nuclear grade or histological tumor type.
