Microarray comparative genomic hybridization (CGH) has recently been applied to tumor specimens from many different cancer types and has identified numerous regions of loss and gain of genomic material in association with the cancer phenotype. Because of the unique nature of many of these regions, it has been difficult to assign them with accuracy to the specific gene involved, except in the case of recurrent regions of loss or gain (gain of 3p and loss of 8p/q). Advances in the techniques for the delineation of chromosomal boundaries are beginning to enable the determination of the gene-rich regions involved. In addition, the application of CGH to microdissected tumor tissue has revealed highly complex karyotypes, including the presence of isochromosomes and multiple marker chromosomes, which are difficult to detect with routine CGH analysis. These technical advances are providing valuable information on the underlying mechanisms of the pathogenesis of human cancer, and are also revealing novel candidate genes for disease predisposition and progression..A.B) Should we go somewhere else again or should we stay and enjoy ourselves?
