In the best traditions of the Apollo space program, the video game X-Morph: Defense is both a good game and a great game - not the sort of best game you will play and not the sort of game you will forget to play - but both and both at the same time. Instead of a straightforward take on a classic twin-stick shooter - like the original X-Morph: Defense, we get a fast-paced, physics-based shooter that feels new and fun, but not scary. Instead of the usual inventory of guns, we get a five-hole turret of lasers. And instead of a handful of other weapons, we get a silly number of Zords. The game provides an enjoyable challenge for those who want to master X-Morph: Defense, in an addictive and funny way. This game goes beyond an average "gun" game, and instead of trying to force you to play a traditional cover-based game, it just throws weapons at you and let you practice to master them. It's hard for me to explain, but I found this game to be more addictive than the others I've tried.
