The effect of methylglyoxal on DNA and membrane damage in human lymphocytes. Increased levels of methylglyoxal (MG) and advanced glycation end-products are associated with diabetic complications and aging. We have shown that MG induces strand breaks in calf thymus DNA. We have further extended these observations by measuring MG-induced DNA damage in human lymphocytes and demonstrating the potential usefulness of this assay in predicting genotoxicity. The dose-dependent formation of apurinic/aprimidinic (AP) sites in human lymphocytes treated with MG for 72 hr was measured. Methylglyoxal concentrations higher than 0.05 mM induced significant increases in AP sites relative to controls. The MG-induced DNA damage was prevented by hypoxanthine or aminoguanidine, demonstrating the important role of MG-derived aldehydes and reactive oxygen species in this
