Ask HN: is a design that doesn't scale down usable? - g0atbutt I've got a design (on A4) that I'm about to proof. I don't want to over complicate it so my question is: should this be designed for print or should I keep it simple? ===== raganwald I've worked in design in both advertising agencies and corporate publishing departments. I'm convinced that every company has exactly one baby picture of a print magazine with a picture of a baby wearing the company's logo. I doubt you're the only one at your company with a baby picture like that. If you're trying to ask if your design is suitable for the newsprint world, then you're probably getting a mixed answer. On the one hand, most U.S. newspaper and magazine readers still use paper. Most of them haven't fully converted to digital. On the other hand, most newspaper readers have high- speed Internet access and the least technology-burdened newspapers have the least computer-savvy readership. Most websites look terrible on a reader's mobile device; most magazines work fine on a reader's mobile device, even if the design looks ungainly. Do you have a role model? How would you like your newsprint design to look? Please note that this is not to say that most newspaper and magazine readers are more technologically savvy than most website users. They still read on a page, not a screen. But people who can access a website are more likely to be more open to considering a site because the technology to make use of it isn't strictly required. On the other hand, if
