A method is described for the detection of the core antigen of human immunodeficiency virus (HIV-1) type 1 in blood plasma samples. The assay uses a radioimmunoassay (RIA) in combination with a polyethylene glycol (PEG) precipitation step to decrease the proportion of nonspecifically adsorbed HIV-1-reactive material. The procedure was initially validated by using synthetic p24 peptide 1A and recombinant core protein CA(196-205) as standards. The assay appears to be specific, reproducible and sensitive and is capable of detecting 0.1 ng/ml of core protein in 100 microliters of plasma. The specificity of the assay was examined by analyzing 24 of these samples in addition to a control group of plasma from non-HIV-1-infected individuals. A significant correlation (p less than
