Virat Kohli's decision to keep a five-man bowling attack did not affect India's chances of winning the first Test in Pune, where they thoroughly outplayed England by 184 runs. (Sampath Kaithan reports from Pune) What was the reason behind India's decision to stick with the pace trio of Umesh Yadav, Ishant Sharma and Jasprit Bumrah, which had so clearly worked for Rohit Sharma's men in the previous Test? Yadav and Bumrah proved their worth when India needed it most in the second innings, with a superb partnership of 86 runs that set up India's victory target. Here is how it happened. India's bowlers were tired by lunch The first Test of India's two-match series against England in Pune ended in a draw on day four, and a top-order collapse on the fourth day left India in a spot of bother. However, there was some good news in the Indian camp, which was the performance of India's bowlers. With enough pep in their step, they returned with a terrific performance. Yadav, in particular, was the pick of the bunch, and he showed that he has the ability to stake his claim as India's first-choice spin option. He received good fortune from a stunning Usman Khawaja mishit off the third ball of the day, which skidded through to the boundary. However, it was an equally brilliant short delivery from Bumrah that turned out to be the turning point of the day. A difficult catch from Ravi Ashwin at first slip didn't cost India, but the umpires allowed Kedar Jadhav to take a long single. It looked like Jadhav was caught at backward point off Ollie Pope's throw, but there was a lot of confusion. However, a TV replay showed a close catch at first slip, and the umpires awarded six runs. England were then reduced to 119 for four in 10.3 overs. What followed was a smooth half-century from Kedar Jadhav off just 22 balls. With Ishant able to bowl into the rough, Jadhav stayed back to the stumps to send down a wide. This forced England to
