There may be some irony to the fact that a website whose founding principle is the free circulation of ideas and information is best used to keep the Internet from flowing freely. But that's what a bill in Congress would have you believe. The bill in question, the Stop Online Piracy Act, was quietly introduced in the House of Representatives on Monday. The focus is on the bill's Section 101, which stipulates that "digital goods"—the phrase is airtightly defined in the bill—don't qualify for the Digital Millennium Copyright Act's safe harbors against copyright infringement; instead, they become subject to copyright prosecution. Many Democrats have joined Rep. Marsha Blackburn (R-Tenn.) in arguing that the bill will erode the Internet as we know it. U.S. Rep. John Conyers Jr. (D-Mich.) told The New York Times that "it is a dangerous act that is out of proportion to the problem we're trying to solve," and U.S. Rep. Bobby Rush (D-Ill.) told The Washington Post that the bill "will harm the free exchange of ideas." Reps. Rush and John Dingell (D-Mich.), who also opposed the bill, are leaders in the Congressional Black Caucus. Of course, the phrase "out of proportion" is a bit of a misnomer in this case. Since the Electronic Frontier Foundation (EFF) estimates that U.S. copyright laws, as currently enforced, cost the economy $100 billion a year, it's hard to dispute that the bill, which would see massive civil penalties on Internet companies based on claims by content owners, is out of proportion. So how does the bill accomplish this? Let us count the ways: It establishes an agency for content owners, the Intellectual Property Enforcement Coordinator, whose mandate is to "coordinate and carry out the enforcement of intellectual property rights on the Internet." A vast and unaccountable body, of course. The agency has the power 3e33713323
