FTorrent is a lightweight torrent client for mono based systems that should be compatible with most mono based systems, such as Linux, OSX and Windows. It is extremely light and shouldn't take any resources. It also supports magnet links, IPv6 and IPv4 torrents. The program has been developed by haarover. Features Very lightweight with almost no resources Supports IPv4 and IPv6 Handles magnet links Automatic port detection Uses libtorrent library Automatically handles fragmented torrents Has a nice simple interface, easily customizable Will display file transfer rate in your system tray Has a very simple file transfer progress indicator Automatic configuration based on magnet links There are only a few complaints about this software. FTorrent is not a very good client, since it's ugly and slow, even for the users who are used to use a different client. It's just like utorrent. The main problem with this application is the speed and the memory it takes up. The speed is just horrible, and it is really slow, even at maximum settings. And the memory it takes up is huge. It's good if you don't mind installing a program, it's just that the majority of its features are lacking. Configurability and file support For the configurability, you have to use Nautilus to manually move files to different places, by clicking the + icon (add) next to the desired drive. For file support, yes, you can do that. For others, some other features are lacking: Can't use magnet links, as there is no magnet support in this app. New entries added to torrent are not automatically downloaded, and you have to manually click the download button. File manager The file manager is very simple and does not support any special features. This is the only missing feature in this application. Storage capacity The storage capacity is nothing, the maximum size is just about 250 MB, in fact, there is no limit to the size, this can be very dangerous for those who want to use this program. This is another missing feature in this application. Limitations In conclusion, FTorrent is a mono torrent client. However, there are still a lot of other features that are missing from 77a5ca646e

FTorrent is a powerful, but also simple and lightweight torrent client. It has a minimalistic interface and offers all the features a regular torrent user needs. Q: Some questions about EF Core migrations in ASP.NET Core 2.2 When I created the first migration, the new migration was automatically created. I can see the method has been generated in migrations folder. But when I manually create another migration, I can not see this method been generated. How can I manually create a new migration file? A: Update 2016-07-03: The migration files are now part of NuGet package. Just use this package manager console command: Install-Package Microsoft.EntityFrameworkCore.Migrations -Version 3.0.0 Or download the file: Install-Package Microsoft.EntityFrameworkCore.Migrations -Version 3.0.0 Original answer: The migration files can be created using Update-Database command. In this case you won't see any "Create" command. By default, Entity Framework Core 3.0 generates Entity Framework migrations from the database model. So, if you are using models, don't forget to configure migrations: var builder = new DbMigrationBuilder(...); builder.HasMigrationHistory = true; //tells EF to use migration history builder.SqlGenerator(...); builder.SqlGenerator(...); builder.SqlGenerator(...); var migration = builder.Build(context.Database.GetDbConnection()); context.Database.Migrate(); You can also manually create migrations and EF will detect them and use it. You'll get the migration file in App_Data/Migrations directory after the command execution. Note: the migrations file has the same name as your database. So, if your database table is called Users, then the migrations file will be named Users.Migrations. Q: Highlight a row in a QTableView when a particular value changes I want to highlight a row in a QTableView if the value of a cell changes. I have a QTableView with a QPushButton as the header of each column. If the user clicks on the button in a certain column, I want to change the value in the cell and highlight the
