I am having difficulty with my first reduction. Binding the lens with the mount collar screwed in the correct hole causes the lens body to get heavily scratched. A reduction in the angle of the front element causes the corners of the diaphragm to be scraped up, but not the sides of the diaphragm. This causes the problem of there being no corners for the dust to get to build up. I have tried, with the same result, to reduce on the back with the seized edge in the binding of the diaphragm screws. One other time, I was not careful enough, and the lens body was screwed into the photographic lens mount, and another one was out. Since then, I have not been able to take any better reduction photosQ: Do all rx uses require an applicative pipeline? I have an overall code structure that has an applicative pipeline like this: `this.someReturnableObject.map(f => this.someObject).flatMap(g => this.anotherThing)` Where 'this' is my class instance and 'f' and 'g' are functions. I noticed that this seems like the most concise way of doing that I could think of and I'm wondering if all RX operations need to be held in an applicative pipeline? It seems that there could be an issue with hanging up on stateful objects while not necessarily mutating the state, but I could be wrong. A: As far as I know, if there are no side-effects, RX their is no problem whatsoever with side-effects. If you want to maintain data parallelism, then yes,
