Key points: The AERA says the intervention is "disappointing" as the retailers rely on a market-based system The AERA says the intervention is "disappointing" as the retailers rely on a market-based system It says the intervention will lead to higher prices and higher power bills It says the intervention will lead to higher prices and higher power bills Electricity retailers fear the government could be looking at winding back the security of supply guarantee While admitting energy prices were lower than in previous years, AERA chief executive Kerry Schott said intervention was needed to stop unjustifiably high prices. "The intervention is disappointing for us as we rely on a market-based system," Mr Schott said. "When consumers see prices go as high as they are, that is when they become more negative towards the entire energy retail industry." There was a noticeable fall in the number of complaints to the Australian Energy Regulator (AER) over market related issues from the previous year 3e33713323
