LG Xnote (R320) - Windows XP, Vista.Q: Is there a difference between the verb negation endings in Latin and English? Both English and Latin have negative infinitives. I come not to make merry, but to mourn with those that mourn. I come not to give help, but to ask for it. It seems that what is being negated is the subject, not the verb. In English, the negative verb is made by adding a -n to the end of the infinitive. In Latin, the -n seems to be added to the end of the infinitive as a negative prefix. So, to me, it looks like there's a distinction between a negative verb and an infinitive. Is there a difference? A: The English formulation is the reduplicative formation: to + noun +ing. (In this structure, the noun is in the dative case, and the accusative form of the verb is the same as the dative. To put it another way, the subject is the complement of “to + noun +ing”.) The Latin, on the other hand, is the ablative of negation: negatus. As a note on the ablative of negation, there is a type of ablative in which the negation is used in a participle: ablativus negatio (just as “negated + participle” is the ablative of negation, “participle + negation” is the ablative of negation). A: The Latin negato is a negative participial form, thus it is not a verb, but a participle. It is used with negare as a “negative infinitive”, i.e. in a negative construction. Thus, in a sentence like Periculum est, the participle is the direct object and thus the subject of negare, not the negatio. The English one is a reduplicative form
