Microsoft.DirectX.Direct3D version 1.0.2902.0.rar. ipx - Mac OS X Server 1.0 Beta. Explanation The first thing to note is the base64-encoded XML file starting with b at the beginning of the lines in the output from the decoding process. I used the tool at to convert the base64-encoded XML to a human-readable format and then took the raw bytes and converted them to a string using the function `bytes2str_utf8`. I then took that string and used the Python function `ast.literal_eval` to convert it into a Python dict. The `@`, `"` and characters in the base64-encoded XML are escaped using `\`. This means the `b` before `@` or before the `"` marks will be interpreted by the Python interpreter as a byte object. Once ast.literal_eval has found the attributes of the dict it can then work out the value of a given attribute in the dict. For example, the attribute name is set to , so we can get the value by looking up in the dict.

class CodeComparer(object): """Identical data structure and data instance sorting algorithm.""" def __init__(self, lhs, rhs): """Compare two Python data structures or data instances.""" self.lhs = lhs self
