Many introductory Photoshop tutorials focus on how to use filters. Although you can use some filters, learning how to use all filters is a real challenge. Make sure that you have a solid understanding of basic composition before you use filters. Is Photoshop for You? Photoshop is a powerful piece of software that can be intimidating to use unless you're actually working with images most of the time. But if you're like most graphic designers, you have to take at least one image from the Internet, extract it from the web page, resize and crop it, and then add a few elements to it. At that point, you're in the land of Photoshop. In fact, it's just about any kind of image manipulation you can do, and you can do it quickly. You can easily add layers with filters and effects without knowing how to use layers in a non-Photoshop program. So if you're a beginner, or just wondering about Photoshop as a tool, here's a quick guide to whether Photoshop is for you: Photoshop is designed to work on raster-based files (images). Flash-based (animation) files are vector-based and don't lend themselves well to Photoshop. By default, Photoshop works with layers, which is a change from older image-editing programs that used a "layer mask" to protect an underlying layer from damage. Photoshop has tools for most design tasks, including layers, layers, brushes, and strokes. Photoshop provides a zillion different tools that enable you to achieve a wide range of editing, image manipulation, and design enhancements and transformations. Know the Basic Photoshop Lingo The most powerful part of Photoshop is its extensive vocabulary of tools, which enables you to create most kinds of images. Most graphic designers use these tools to create, edit, and enhance images. The most common used terms are outlined here: Layer: A layer is an underlying element that's under another layer. In other programs, you use a mask to obscure parts of an image, but in Photoshop, you use layers. Layer mask: A layer mask is used to hide the image underneath the layer. Normally, a layer is visible because it's the only thing in a folder that has no mask. Brush: A brush is a tool that strokes an image, drawing or filling a spot with a color. Brushes are most effective when used in combination with other tools, including layers and image masks

Q: App crashes when using firebase snapshot value I have been trying to work on this for a while now and can't figure out why it is crashing. To make this a bit simpler, here are the two methods I'm trying to use: `FIRDatabase.database().reference().child("depotrooms").observe(.value, with: {(snapshot) in print(snapshot) if let snap = snapshot.children.allObjects as? [FIRDataSnapshot] { for snap in snap { let snapValue = snap.value as! [String : AnyObject] print(snapValue) } } })` and `FIRDatabase.database().reference().child("depotrooms").observeSingleEvent(of: .value, with: {(snapshot) in let snap = snapshot.value as! [String : AnyObject] print(snapshot) // Prints: Snap[key1:{value1}, key2:{value2}] self.snapshots.append(snap)`

Q: Java Game: can't figure out how to use final and static properly I'm trying to make an application which is basically a simple game in Java. Here's my problem. I want to have a level that's generated randomly that is presented to you when the game starts. However, I want a configuration file which is present when the game starts. I have this in the config file: `String puzzle;` and in the main game class this is inside a run method: `String puzzle = Configuration.getString("puzzle");` Then, in the configuration class, I have this: `public static String getString(String key) { return properties.getProperty(key); }` So, the idea is that when the game starts, it checks the configuration file and pulls the right puzzle. My problem is that this doesn't work, as there seems to be no output. So my guess is that I am using the `getString()` method incorrectly? Any idea how I can fix this? A: First, don't use a default constructor, it isn't what you want to be doing. You should have a default constructor that does nothing. Then, in the config file, create a Properties object, either using a static factory method or just instantiate it yourself using a `System.loadProperty` method call. To check for the result in the config, do something like: `properties.setProperty("puzzle", "something"); String x = properties.getProperty("puzzle"); if(x!= null) { // Do something with the result }` You can use this to set the puzzle at run time. If you just want to randomize it at the start time, you can use: `String randomValue = Configuration.getString("puzzle", "random"); if(randomValue== null) { String puzzle = randomValue; }`
Note: I've also changed your check to use an `if`, rather than an `if(x!="")`, because if you get your puzzle from the config file, then it will always be null if the file doesn't exist. The point of having a default constructor is for you to create an object that is "empty", that is, that doesn't have anything to configure. A non-default constructor usually creates a configuration object. Treatment of female
