From the player's perspective, "HyperMotion Technology" features three key benefits. First, a more detailed and more accurate player model means that the game responds to real-life actions in a way that is more realistic and intuitive. Second, an improved "true velocity" system is able to interpret the data that the cameras collect and allows for a more accurate understanding of the motion of each player on the pitch. Third, the visual representation of the player model and animations is improved, with more realistic and lifelike animations. During the gameplay development process, two full-time research labs joined the FIFA team to more closely examine what the data collected from a real-life football match can tell us. By combining the knowledge of the research labs, it is possible to refine "HyperMotion Technology" by adding animations and a more detailed player model as appropriate. What are the most important challenges in developing "HyperMotion Technology?" Scott Buscemi - Gameplay & Animations Creative Director Movement and physics capture is one of the main challenges of "HyperMotion Technology," and the high level of data we collect every second of gameplay is a huge contributor to this. We have multiple cameras which collect the motion of players in every direction; different cameras collect the information at different points in time, allowing us to accurately "map out" the movement of all players in each moment in time. On top of this, we have the challenges of combining the data we collect from each player to make sure that our animations and physics accurately reflect real-life movement. "HyperMotion Technology" includes a system called "SportVU" which is responsible for collecting and collecting the data that our animations and physics are built on. SportVU takes all of the camera data we collect and combines it with data collected from previous matches to build accurate player movements and actions. This data is then processed through multiple layers of algorithms, which simulate the physics of players in the game, so that it is accurate from the start of a match. The algorithms are highly accurate but resource-intensive, so it is critical that our system can be used for other games if we want to ensure we are at the forefront of our technology. "HyperMotion Technology" is a major step forward for our game engine, as we needed to ensure the game was able to deal with the incredible amount of data that
