Intellectualizing reality "Intellectualizing reality" is the view of some branches of contemporary social science that human beings are rational decision makers, that all of us spontaneously set out to maximize our own utilities in this world. It has been attributed to thinkers such as Anthony Flew and Alvin Plantinga. Aristotle and the interpretation of 'Acting wisely' In Aristotelian philosophy "Being right and being good" or "Being right and acting right" is the other half of "Being right and being happy" or "Being good and being happy". So good people, wise people and virtuous people, are happy. Aristotle said: "It is better to be just and happy than to be unjust and unhappy". Morality becomes important to humans in the intellectual world, when they realize that it is better to be just and happy than it is to be unjust and unhappy. Aristotle seemed to have understood that in his book "The Nicomachean Ethics" (in which he asserted that happiness is the prime object of life). And during the Renaissance, the view of Aristotle was disseminated among the leading intellectuals of the West. Plantinga and the Intellectuality of Divine Intelligence According to Alvin Plantinga, the doctrine of intellectualizing reality is a natural consequence of theism, because theism makes it clear that the ultimate reason for the existence of the world (and human rationality) is "A divine act of intelligence". A strange "fact" which exists in the world of reality, as a consequence of the existence of a world, is that it is intelligible to us. It is intelligible to us. This fact, that the world of reality is intelligible to us, is not a fact about the world of reality but a fact about us. What this means is that the world of reality is intelligible to us as a consequence of the existence of our rational faculties. If God were not finite and God did not have a rational nature, then there would not be any intelligible world. And if there were no intelligible world then there would be no fact of the matter. The fact of the matter is that there is an intelligible world. So the intelligible world exists because there is a rational being who made it. Plantinga says that the doctrine of intellectualizing reality is a natural consequence of theism. Because rationality is an attribute of God, then the intelligible world is an attribute of God. And
