Q: How to change dropdown background color when it is clicked?

I have a horizontal dropdown in my UI. I need to change its background color when it is clicked. Should I use templates or some other feature? A: Try using CSS. For example: `.dropdown`

`>.ui-menu-dropdown { background-color: #ff543d; } // items` Q:

Why not use a graphics engine rather than a general purpose 3D engine? In the realm of 3D computer graphics, there seems to be a constant trend towards generic 3D engines that can be plugged into any game/platform. By this, I mean you can write your own engine and utilize it in basically any platform, so you don't need to get into the details of how your 3D rendering is happening inside the platform. Why do people not build a 3D engine like this? Or is it for simplification of writing a game? That is, why not write a generic engine that supports the rendering as well as the physics and maybe even the audio in it? I know that programming 3D rendering is very specific and cannot be universal, but what is the point of writing a game engine when a generic one can be? A: I think the reason why you don't see it being done is because it's not a simple matter to make it work. You'll need to implement your own physically-based lighting model and ambient occlusion, understand texture mipmaps, and implement the material system in a way that it works for your needs. You'll also need to understand shaders so that you can write your own. The net result is that the complexity is very large, and game programmers may prefer to use a pre-made engine that's been proven to work, rather than try to reinvent the wheel. A: Because: There's a lot of game engines out there, some of them at least 10-20x bigger than Unreal or Unity. Then you'd need to keep up with all of them. You can't really re-write them. (Maybe you can but I'd really doubt it) You don
