A: If you've bought the game legally from the PlayStation Store, I imagine you need the game's online account for the PSN store to provide the games subscription functionality (not sure what you call it). I've already got one with the PS3 version of the game and I do not own a Playstation Vita. I got it when the PSN was first released (I think) by use of a voucher code so I do not know how I used it. But when I went to redeem a voucher code for a PS3 game I received an email with the voucher code for the PSN store for the game. The email I received was for the Sony Entertainment Network: Platinum Pass to PSN with which I could use the PSN store account. The email was sent to a (typically) free email address I used for my account. On the PSN store, the PSN store account is associated with the email I used to set up my PSN account, so the code you need to get the key for the game will be associated with your PSN account. The same process will work in the Xbox One store if I am not mistaken. The present invention relates to a method for the production of a plastic-coated paper product. More specifically, the invention relates to a method for applying a plastic-containing coating to a paper product, wherein the plastic is located at least partially on the surface of the paper product. The present invention is particularly, though not exclusively, well-suited for applying a plastic-coated paper product to a variety of support surfaces. For example, the present invention can be utilized to produce plastic-coated papers that can be positioned on containers and that resist the development of foam and ice formation on such containers. Such plastic-coated papers are particularly useful as liner sheets in a variety of containers, such as milk containers, fuel tanks, dry cell battery containers, infant bottles, and the like. In the past, a variety of plastic-coated papers have been produced for particular applications. One type of plastic-coated paper product is known as a "coated tissue" product. Such products are generally characterized by having a generally uniform coating of plastic on a paper product such that the application of force to such products results in a plastic film that tears away from the product. Such products are especially useful as liner sheets for disposable containers. Prior plastic-coated papers have not proven to be entirely satisfactory, however, due to
