If you're going to buy a digital SLR camera, one that is aimed at photographers, then you can use your computer to create your images and then print them. ## Getting started with Photoshop In this section, I walk you through the process of using Photoshop as a beginner. Choose from three different paths to start in Photoshop. You may choose from the following: * **Work directly in Adobe Bridge, Adobe's file-management program:** If you're a beginner and plan to use Photoshop for digital photography, you may prefer to work in Adobe Bridge rather than Photoshop. If you know nothing about digital photography and are just starting out, you may want to work in Photoshop. The biggest advantage of working in Adobe Bridge is that it gives you an overview of your images before you start your photo editing. You can work on images in Bridge and then go into Photoshop as needed. You can send images from Bridge to Photoshop directly. However, if you plan to shoot and process images quickly or edit images one by one, I recommend that you work directly in Photoshop, bypassing Bridge. You can then save the images you create in Bridge. * **Create a new file in Photoshop:** This approach is for intermediate and advanced users. If you're starting out, working in Photoshop is likely to challenge your skills. In this approach, you start with a new layer and place items on that layer. Because this approach is more complex, you should be more prepared to understand how things work in Photoshop. It takes more time to create a file using this method, but you can work with the file after you create it. * **Work in a pre-existing file:** If you already have a file that you want to work on, you can use this method. In this approach, you open your existing file and work in Photoshop. Your new edits are placed on a new layer that's next to the original layer. I used the Bridge versus Photoshop path to show you how to get started in Photoshop. Now I show you how to use a new file.

What's New in the Cs3 Photoshop Portable Free Download?

Findings from the NIH-funded study published in the prestigious journal PLOS Medicine indicates that cancer, in particular prostate cancer, may increase the risk of Parkinson's disease (PD) in men. This is the first study that confirms that the risk of PD increases in men with cancer. Prostate cancer is the most common cancer in men and the second most common cause of cancer death. Moreover, PD is the second most common neurodegenerative disorder, affecting about 1 million men and women in the United States. The researchers concluded that the excess risk in men is small but meaningful and "the magnitude of the relative risk remains unclear."

WHAT THE STUDY FOUND Researchers from the National Institutes of Health-funded Parkinson's Progression Markers Initiative (PPMI) reviewed the medical records of more than 6,000 men diagnosed with prostate cancer, who were part of a longitudinal, NIH-funded cohort study. Participants were matched with more than 2,300 men without prostate cancer. The goal was to compare the survival time between the two groups to determine if patients with prostate cancer had a shorter life expectancy. The researchers also compared the prevalence of PD in participants after the incidence of cancer to compare between the two groups.

WHAT THE RESEARCH MEANS Most of the patients are older than 75 years of age and most are treated with radical prostatectomy (surgery). Several studies have shown that radical prostatectomy may be associated with increased risk of PD. The researchers noted that this study is a unique study in that it used medical records, which are important for a more accurate picture of treatment intensity. Also, it was a cohort study, which means that one group started the study with other factors, such as different medications and treatments, while the other group did not. The researchers found that men with prostate cancer had a significant longer survival time than those without. This would suggest that the risk of PD in men with prostate cancer is smaller than expected. The findings from this study should not make men with prostate cancer avoid needed care. In fact, the researchers believe that men should "adhere to recommended treatment and healthy lifestyle behaviors regardless of their diagnosis." The researchers recognized that "these conclusions are limited to the subpopulation of men who have been diagnosed with prostate cancer, which is only a small subset of the total population." The findings, therefore, suggest that men with prostate cancer face a risk of PD that is similar to
