Bruce Pharmacokinetics and Pharmacodynamics of Cardiotoxic Steroids. Cardiotoxic steroids (CTs) have been used for decades to treat heart failure, but results have been inconsistent and no class-wide standard has been applied. We aimed to compare the pharmacokinetics and pharmacodynamics of CTs in a large cohort of patients with chronic heart failure, and potentially identify optimal doses and administration schedules. We extracted the pharmacokinetic parameters from published data (17 drugs). We compared the effects of CTs using i) the drug concentrations at the heart, ii) the maximum drug concentration achieved, and iii) the magnitude of the effect, including effects on left ventricular ejection fraction and heart rate. Among 17 CTs, levosimendan (long-acting) and milrinone had the largest effect on LV systolic function, whereas metoprolol and milrinone had the largest positive chronotropic effect. No drug improved diastolic function. When the maximal drug concentration was used to assess individual CTs, concentrations were highest for levosimendan and milrinone. However, when the activity was assessed as the integrated drug concentration over time (area under the curve), levosimendan had the largest activity (more than 7-fold larger than milrinone). The efficacy of CTs depends on their administration schedule and drug concentration. Our findings can be used to optimize administration schedules for individual CTs.#N canvas 0 0 1069 865 10; #X obj 70 348 list-
