Year Review: 2014 Picked up a project to design, develop and install a single sign-on (SSO) system that would allow campus staff to log into the faculty portal via various IDs. This was due within a few weeks; we had to build the application on a very tight schedule, work with the IT department to enable the SSO, and get faculty to sign up within 3 weeks of the invitation for trial. We quickly realized we weren't ready for the job. I was mostly just coding, though I did contribute some CSS and HTML. I also discovered a pretty serious issue with the SQL password store. Somehow an SQL tool was able to snarf a copy of the passwords of all users currently logged in. This enabled the attacker to login with the credentials of any other user, which of course includes the credentials of people higher up the security chain. This meant a full security audit, because IT staff's passwords were stored in the same table as faculty staff's, and our system was only designed to allow people to login with their own credentials. The problem was quickly fixed and the system put into production. The SSO worked perfectly, and the staff loved it. So much so that we put it in production for all other faculty (meaning people with a faculty email address) to use. This enabled our staff to quickly see what was happening on the other faculty's computers, which in turn enabled them to log into their staff computers to help in the service desk or administrative tasks. This was my first project as a manager, and I'm very happy that I was able to deliver a job on time, on budget, and in high quality. Written work and Research For our dissertation research, I'm also coding the backend to a deceptively simple news website ( I spent a lot of time on this research, reviewing PDFs, performing content analysis, and even logging the last 75 million+ likes of posts on Facebook (as requested by my thesis advisor). I took the raw data (which was table-based) and transformed it into a data structure that made it really easy to consume. I'm also building up a test suite for the code. As with the other project, I had to do a lot of research. There are lots of resources for this on the web, but I also started a database of my own (
