For those people who don't know, there are a handful of differences between the fork blocks and mainnet, and these features will not function properly unless you're running your own full node on the testnet. The most significant of these differences is that there is currently only one validator on the testnet, and each validator can only add new blocks to the testnet. They cannot remove blocks. Thus, all validators are required to always be online, and the validity of the entire network is only as strong as the most recently added block. There is currently one other difference – the target difficulty is programmed as 220, but the difficulty adjuster is currently at 100. These two values will converge towards each other very quickly, so you don't have to worry about having the correct understanding of how the network works. There is also a validator daemon, currently known as nodeos, that controls a majority of the network's state and behavior, and is currently not on the mainnet. Why bother? Because you're gonna have a great time! ? We have been working on testnet for a very long time, and there are a lot of things to explore. There are many more things that can be done to make the testnet a lot more useful, but not everything was done for testnet – things like upcoming changes to the user experience of signing transactions, and support for “downloading” new testnet blocks, not just the ability to create them. There are also things like the validator daemon that we can't really explore yet. If these tools do become useful, we will have more capacity than we need. However, the capacity is far more than we had when mining evergreen, which is the standard for hashing that we use for our consensus mechanism. Unfortunately, evergreen is not the only consensus mechanism. Others like prokopay and ccorda-node are also possible consensus mechanisms, and require their own, different testnets and tools. There are also many changes to be made to the protocol. For example, one of the issues I've noticed is the protocol's reliance on a dynamically changing difficulty number to help it reach consensus – in both testnet and mainnet. Difficulties are meant to be programmable, and they can be programmed so as to increase or decrease with the block count depending on the preferences of the protocol creators. Another change in this area pPhillipscombo Indonesian puzzle game "ppp" - also known as "connect the dots" - lets you test your creative skills in a music based game which combines pattern recognition with the above mentioned logic puzzles. While you should be able to solve every level within 10 moves, a hidden mode exists with different graphics and a time trial. If you get used to the game, there is a hint mode that you can use to solve those levels you have failed to solve otherwise. If you are not used to this type of puzzle yet, the game has been set to give you several hints, but it will get tricky from level to level. Tag Archives: t. rex Late last month, for the first time ever, a public confirmation came through that paleontologists had found a Tyrannosaurus rex foot in Wyoming's Cloverly Formation. The specimen had been discovered in 2012 by a man named Kristine DeLong, an amateur paleontologist who found the fossil while digging for fossils with a friend in a field near the town of Cloverly. At the time, a passing paleontologist and DeLong's friend asked her what she was doing, she told him, and he then let the two of them finish working on the fossil. Some time later the paleontologists saw the finds posted online and asked if she'd be willing to sell them. DeLong agreed, but then an auction was set up for the items that wasn't to her liking. When DeLong heard about that she decided to donate the specimens to the Wyoming Dinosaur Center and the fossil was duly preserved. [Check out the full report in the link below.] Three weeks ago, the picture above was tweeted and promptly liked by noted paleontologist Philip Currie, whose interpretation of this find has been well-documented. In a tweet published on Thursday, DeLong offered an explanation for the very condition of the foot. “I found the foot bone in 1997, that’s why the bone is roughed up,” she wrote. This claim begs the question: how could she have found the bone in 1997? The fossil in question was discovered in 1997, but that’s nearly 30 years ago. Remember, this find was discovered in a field in Wyoming, a state that was infamous for the constant presence of dinosaur fossils when the fossil industry was in full bloom. Between 1997 and 2012, how many
