The aim of the present study was to investigate the potential effects of capsaicin-rich extract of red pepper (CPE) and its main constituents on intestinal epithelial barrier function in vitro. CPE, capsaicin and dihydrocapsaicin (DHC) were added to a model of intestinal epithelial barrier consisting of a Caco-2/HT29-MTX co-culture. Barrier function was studied by measuring transepithelial electrical resistance (TEER). Transepithelial permeability was assessed by measuring the migration of 4 kDa-FITC-Dextran into the incubation medium. Relative expression of ZO-1 and occludin mRNA was analyzed. The effects of CPE, capsaicin and DHC on the expression of ZO-1 and occludin were also investigated by confocal microscopy and Western blot analysis. TEER was significantly reduced after CPE addition. Permeability of the epit 595f342e71
