Q: Object oriented implementation in android I am new to android programming, so have no knowledge of core java or other programming languages. By going through android docs, I know some basics about android development, Java, Comparators etc. Although I am not able to figure out how should i start implementing object oriented concepts in android. If you have knowledge on this, please help. A: It is not possible for you to implement object-oriented concept without learning about Java properly and writing Java code, at least the core Java concepts. But if you are willing to learn Java anyway to learn Android, I would highly recommend you to learn core Java first, since it is one of the two languages Android development is based on. After that, you will know how to write code, how to handle exceptions, do stuff with OOP and everything, and you will have no problems to understand the new android documentation. In recent years, there have been many cases where standards are established for transmitting and recording video signals in consideration of the various attributes of video signal recording/reproducing apparatuses such as low cost, high-resolution and high-grade outputs. As the standards, there are known a protocol of using one tape for recording main data signals and auxiliary data signals in one frame and a protocol of using two tapes for recording both main data signals and auxiliary data signals in one frame. In the example of using one tape, the tape consists of one tape, and the respective main data and auxiliary data signals are recorded in different areas on the tape. In the example of using two tapes, an effective area on one tape and an ineffective area on the other tape are reserved, and the respective main data and auxiliary data signals are recorded in the effective area and the ineffective area, respectively. In the example of using two tapes, for example, data is recorded on the tape using a high-speed mode (hereinafter referred to as a fast mode) in which the data can be recorded on one frame, and data is recorded on the tape using a low-speed mode (hereinafter referred to as a slow mode) in which the data can be recorded on two frames. In the recording described above, the data recorded in the effective area on the tape are subjected to correction, and the data are output from a reproduced apparatus to an external apparatus. On the other hand, the data recorded in the ineffective area on the tape are not subjected to correction, and the data are not output from the reproduced apparatus to the external apparatus. In order to further increase the capacity of a tape, two-
