HyperMotion Technology also allows the artificial intelligence (AI) of the 'pitch intelligence' function to be fully personalised. Al technology has been further refined with the ability to predict what each player is likely to do, improve decision-making and adjust to the on-going momentum of the game. "The pace of the game is faster than ever and so is the awareness of each player, which is why it is now more important than ever to create a game that empowers the individual, but also leverages the collective," said Peter Hogg. Executive Vice President of EA SPORTS, FIFA. "FIFA 22 not only supports this notion, but it also creates a new level of realism with the technology that has never been seen before." To make this dream a reality, FIFA 22 features a revamped and improved player model, goal celebrations and "elasticity", a fresh mechanic that allows players to move faster and more fluidly across the pitch. This applies, for example, to the movement of the ball – players are now allowed to move quicker when the ball is in close proximity, meaning that they can either delay a pass in anticipation of when it will be received, or run through a split second earlier than normal. "These new animations and in-game responses, coupled with the HyperMotion Technology, are sure to revolutionise the FIFA player experience, making you feel that you are truly a part of the game," said Hogg. "By improving the player model, we have allowed real players to be captured in our game in more realistic and believable ways and you will feel as if you are playing against them." FIFA fans can check out the in-depth breakdown of the "pitch intelligence" system in detail on the game's official website here. "This is only the beginning for FIFA's incredible team of developers and their dedication to push technology to new heights. We are incredibly excited to roll out the technology and reveal more details as the game releases," said Steve Copeland, Executive Producer for FIFA. "Collectively, we're making a football game unlike any other and a truly groundbreaking experience that delivers new levels of realism, authenticity and connectivity with players from all over the world." FIFA 22 is scheduled to launch for Xbox One, PlayStation 4 and PC on
