

Motion capture data isn't new in FIFA, but there has never been a more detailed database of player movements. Total Player Projection data is collected during each minute of play and used to make matches feel more authentic, ensure offensive and defensive play flows and the timing of player actions is corrected. Free kick locations, backlift heights and player animations have been simulated using a combination of real-life data and "animations recreated using player motion capture." The Xbox One S and PlayStation 4 versions will have exclusive HyperMotion Technology compared to the PS4 Pro and Xbox One X versions. What Are Total Player Projection Data, and How Does it Work? Total Player Projection Data is a database that captures the unique, real-life movement patterns of each player. The data is captured on-board the motion capture suit, using wide-angle cameras that capture the body in 10-second intervals. The data can then be imported into the FIFA server to produce a large database of player movement that can be used to power gameplay. The reason a large database of player movement is crucial is because it allows total player projection data to perform certain functions that cannot be done through real-life data alone. The capabilities of player movements in FIFA are vast; with over 150 variables, Total Player Projection data can simulate the movements and actions of every player during a game of FIFA, including dodging and ducking tackles, finishing in front of the goalkeeper, ball possession and even the way a player controls the ball when in possession. The database of player movements can be used to power many aspects of gameplay, from advanced AI systems, to physics engine, ball control and more. In keeping with FIFA tradition, a database of player movements is unique to each console and therefore only for use on the specific console's version of FIFA. FIFA 19 used a full 360 degrees camera on the suit to capture player movements and In FIFA 20, the same cameras are still used, but their positions have changed and they are now placed on the head and torso. However, there are six cameras placed on the head and 12 on the body, as opposed to the 360-degree cameras found on the motion capture suits in FIFA 19 and FIFA 19 and FIFA 19 and earlier games. While this comes at a cost to
