Photoshop is designed to work with layers. To create an image with layers, you must first create a layer, then group it. The layers can be turned on and off for easy editing and reuse. The interface of Photoshop is great for beginners. It has many tools that beginners can start with and work their way up to more advanced tools. You can open an image in Photoshop by simply clicking on it, or you can click the Photoshop icon to view the image in full-screen mode. You can use the following steps to open an image in Photoshop: 1. Choose File⇒Open and navigate to your photo. 2. Select the image you want to open by clicking on it. 3. Click the Open button. You see the Layers panel on the left and the image on the right. 4. Click the Layers panel to turn the image into a layer. Now you have an image with one layer, and the button that says New Layer is selected. If you aren't using the manual mode, you have the Auto Layers setting, which creates a layer automatically for every new image. 5. To make changes to a layer, click and drag a square with a photo-editing tool (pencil, paint, etc.) on the layer. To paint a different color, turn on the Paint Bucket tool and click in the layer. You can edit a layer by simply clicking on it with a tool, as shown in Figure 9-1. Any mistakes that you make don't automatically delete or remove the layer. You have to undo your changes by clicking the trash can. You can edit a layer's effects in the same way as you edit a regular image with the layers. You can add text, recolor or resize an image, select or deselect the different areas, and crop or enhance an area in the layer. 6. Save your file as a JPG or JPEG file with a high compression level. Figure 9-1: Edits are saved into a photo and assembled into layers. Facebook's recent IPO, a major test for the social networking giant, went poorly. But things have been looking up recently, with the social networking titan guiding the social media space by giving users and developers control over their own data. Now, Facebook is taking the first major step toward building a privacy wall. On Thursday, a Facebook engineer announced the development on Facebook's technical blog. The goal is to let users control who can see their data and who can use it for data mining. The announcement came just a day after Facebook announced it was rolling out Friend Finder, a tool designed to let users find friends in the same areas, like colleges or geographic areas. The feature is meant to let users control who can find them when they're looking for friends, like when they're trying to find users who live in Palo Alto, Calif. It's similar to the new privacy settings coming to Facebook this week. Facebook is also developing new privacy controls for people's photos. The social network has already said that it is planning to put a "do not follow" button next to people's photos, which lets people block others from seeing their photos. And the company has said in the past it is looking at giving users more control over the images people share about them. Facebook's idea with the picture privacy is to let people "take back control" of their photos. If people want to share their pictures, people need to know that they allow that. "This is a big step towards giving people control over the images they post, and giving people more options," Zuckerberg said on Facebook's official blog. "By giving people more control over the privacy of information they share, we're making it easier for you to manage what information you give to others and to use your information in new ways to connect with your friends, family, and others." Facebook also recently started playing hardball with companies that use its technology to mine data from users' social network accounts. Facebook has sent out letters to companies that allow developers to access people's photos or use their data to find others, demanding that the companies pay Facebook to keep doing that. So far, those companies have complied. Despite the privacy push, Facebook remains a hot place for people to share their information. Facebook boasts that it has more than 2 billion people using its service. It's also earned a reputation as the Facebook to get into college. And it even set
