In the present work, multi-layered magnetic graphene/polydopamine hybrid nanosheets (mGO/PDA) have been synthesized by a one-step strategy under mild conditions through the synergistic effect of electrostatic attraction, strong magnetic property and redox ability of GO and PDA. The mGO/PDA hybrid nanosheets have been applied as adsorbent for the removal of oil pollution in water. The results indicated that mGO/PDA exhibited strong adsorption ability for 2,4-dichlorophenol (DCP), whereas much lower adsorption efficiency was observed for hexadecane, n-hexadecane and naphthalene. As the adsorption process proceeded, the time for reaching adsorption equilibrium was shortened, and the adsorption amount increased with the increase in adsorption time. The adsorption kinetics were best fitted by the pseudo-second-order equation and the adsorption equilibrium data was fitted by the Langmuir isotherm model, which indicated that the adsorption of DCP on the mGO/PDA hybrid nanosheets was a monolayer process and the adsorption was controlled by electrostatic attraction, the  $\pi$ - $\pi$  electron interaction and hydrophobic interaction. Moreover, this adsorbent possesses the remarkable activity in wastewater and soil. This work offers a new and promising strategy for the fabrication of triple-layered hybrid nanosheets with excellent properties for environmental remediation.Generation of toroidally twisted DNA with site-specific nucleosides. The report concerns the design of biochemically stable double-stranded DNA (dsDNA) complexes in which two opposing strands have been twisted by 180°. A pair of oligonucleotides with a complementary strand containing two nucleosides (X and Y, X or Y can be pyrimidine nucleoside analogs) and a 'hook' sequence have been cross-linked into a toroidally twisted dsDNA. Cross-linking generated thermal hybrids that can be resolved by agarose gel electrophoresis.
