Click on Photoshop from your Start menu, and you'll launch the program. I suggest that you create a shortcut for the program so that you can launch it easily through your Start menu. You can do so by right-clicking Photoshop and choosing Send To. Select the Desktop, and then Start. In the Properties dialog box, make sure that the Show Desktop Icons check box is selected. Select Desktop from the left side of the dialog box and then the left pane on the right side of the dialog box, where you will find the keystroke you want to use for your shortcut. Q: In Portal 2, why do the Carbonites care so much about the Red Mercury? In Portal 2 there are several whole levels that take place under the Red Mercury, and the Carbonites care way too much about its discovery (and thievery). Where did the Carbonites obtain their knowledge of the Red Mercury? Is it obtained from sample reports that the Aperture Science employees left behind in the labs? Or from a full report from the surface? A: Because the original portal game featured a slightly easier mode of entry for the carbonites. Here we played as the carbonites. (I'm not sure this is exactly how it was in the original game, but I know in the sequel it was changed to suit the carbonites style. There was one boss in particular that was impossible to defeat from this mode of entry (granted I'm not 100% sure how he managed to get past the ISOP bots) so this just might explain how some carbonites knew of the red mercury.) A: The Carbonites discovered the Red Mercury in series 1's human tests of "The Portal". They wanted the "high" power it gave them, so they followed Aperture's protocols until they found that there was another test (and a bit of a loophole) in the new automated robot testing field. They infiltrated a portal to that field to get it. A: In the two available Carbonite stories (Arrival and Aperture Science Meltdown) (the first one is not canonical, as it takes place in Aperture Science, so is not canon, as far as I remember), the Carbonites find evidence of the Red Mercury from Aperture Science's leaked reports. It turns out that the human experiments were the real deal. Numerous types of sleeping and other flat article support surfaces have been proposed for a variety of different applications, such as beds, cots, cushioned pads, seats, and the like. While some support surfaces of this type are relatively thin, such as those made from foam, others are relatively thick, such as those made from fiberglass or the like. Some of these support surfaces are portable, while others are static in nature. And, while several support surfaces include a multiplicity of small protrusions, others are flat. It would be desirable to provide a support surface that is relatively thin, has a durable construction, and provides a relatively soft cushion for a user, but
