GrâÇÀ 7 1 0.Borehole seismic measurement provides valuable information regarding geologic structures surrounding a borehole. Primary geophysical information provided by seismic measurements is the identification of pore-fluid, lithologic and fluid (e.g., pore-fluid, oil, brine, etc.) properties. Acquisition and interpretation of seismic data assists in determining types of material in the subsurface and can be used to indicate the presence and distribution of hydrocarbons. Variation of seismic wave speed through a given lithologic change, and divergence of acoustic paths through anisotropic media, provide additional geophysical information. Attempts to provide tools that help to improve the quality of seismic data while reducing the cost and complexity of operations are known in the art. Examples of efforts in this area can be found in U.S. Pat.
