Sewage sludge and rice husk are good sources of organic biomass and are suitable for production of fermentation broths with high biomass content. In this study, wastewater sludge was used to produce zymogens in submerged culture, without addition of hydrolysate. The original wastewater sludge was digested by Enteromorpha prolifera to obtain a second-generation sewage sludge and thereafter a nutrient-rich fermentation broth containing organic biomasses was obtained. Meanwhile, rice husk was used to obtain a product rich in ferulic acid. Enzymes were produced from the fermented materials by fermentation with Aspergillus niger, and therefore the biomass could be used as a natural, alternative, and sustainable resource for producing essential oils, flavourings, and antioxidant compounds. In addition, hydrolysate could be used as a nutrient for the fermentation process. Production of key enzymes and compounds from these biomass materials would be applied for biocatalysis in functional and biotechnological processing.The present invention relates to a method for making a porous ceramic article and, more particularly, to a method for making a porous ceramic article from a powder mixture which includes a plurality of ceramic particles whose pores are interconnected by a phase of essentially nonporous material. The fabrication of porous ceramic materials is a complicated and relatively difficult process. In the first place, it is necessary that the ceramic powder mixture forming the material be relatively free of voids or air pockets which may cause the solidified article to shrink more than desired and to have a density less than desired. Further, the material must be sintered at a high temperature at which the interconnection of the pores is sufficiently complete so that the pores do not collapse by coalescence of the ceramic particles during the sintering process. It is also desirable that the sintered article have porosity substantially uniform throughout the article to facilitate the subsequent recovery of a shaped article from the porous blank. The following U.S. patents disclose various methods for making porous ceramic materials, including the use of ceramic particles which are mixed with a lubricant during the mixing process to fill the interstices between the particles and provide a binder for the particles: U.S. Pat.
