Roblox is an online virtual world where players use a remote to manipulate characters known as "Builders". A game is then created in the background which the players access with a username and password. Players explore the world and build objects to their hearts' content, in a wide range of styles, from simple houses and castles to more intricate (and dangerous) designs. To keep track of all the object creations players have built, Roblox provides a map with a visual overview of the player's creations. While the first year focused primarily on creating rich worlds and game play, Roblox has since developed many additional features, including dedicated channels that allow users to communicate. These channel features include messaging, in which users can send each other documents, or even other custom types of messages. Roblox also has a blog system and dedicated channels for large public events, such as art shows and holiday celebrations. Outside of these channels, users are able to "watch" games, play games against each other, or "team up" to face off against another team in a special online war. Teams may also be formed on a casual basis, to hang out online and enjoy the company of other Roblox users. As players explore, they can keep track of a running list of in-game achievements, as well as in-game awards, which can be earned for various achievements or by working with others. Robux, the virtual currency, can be earned by becoming a high enough level and by completing gameplay challenges. Not only can users build upon their creations, they can also play against other players' creations (unlike most other online games), which gives players an incentive to try new things as well as to see what they can learn from playing against others. Players can also ask others to create their own games for them, which turns the game building process into a collaborative effort. Some games are created by creators specifically for children or for users with various disabilities, and often will include features such as handicap-friendly or voice-enabled controls. Players can also apply to join "Builders Incorporated", an exclusive website for those players who contribute to the development of Roblox. Roblox has been praised in publications including The New Yorker and Time Magazine, and has been featured in both a documentary and a series of educational videos produced by the Federal Communications Commission. In 2012, Forbes listed Roblox as one of the fastest growing companies, and the company received $45 million from a private
