Roblox was launched in June 2006 by its founders, David Baszucki and Erik Cassel, and is now owned by 22cans (a division of Electronic Arts's EA Access) and Microsoft. The original idea for the platform came from the two, who met while doing their freshman year at the University of Waterloo in Canada. The two considered making a MUD type of game when they began developing the system, but they soon changed their ideas and decided to create a more traditional video game. Along with the system, they released a programming language, named "Lua", to enable users to make their own games and stories. Roblox allows its users to create their own world in which they can explore, explore other users' worlds to collaborate, and play games made by other users. Roblox is free to play, but users can purchase "booster packs" with additional features such as an option to allow players to play in multiplayer games with a friend, a powerful programming API, and digital items for sale within games. Roblox was primarily designed for children, and anyone is free to create games of any genre for the site. The Roblox Corporation currently maintains the website and a wiki. Roblox is designed to be scalable, meaning that as the platform and community grows, so will the number of user-made games. As a result, Roblox has become a popular platform on which users can make games for themselves as well as others. Roblox has earned a loyal following of users who enjoy sharing their creations with each other. One of the platform's early successes was called Geometry Dash, a game where players design a track for a snake to run through by sliding blocks through fun obstacles and tunnels. The game became very popular and inspired many other games with this underlying theme. In 2012, the game received a Harvard Business School case study. The game currently has more than 32 million players, and has received two Guinness World Records: "Most Bricks Placed During a Length of Time" and "Most Streamed Game of 2013." Later that year, Roblox reached an all-time high of 50 million users, and was awarded the "Best Education Technology" at the 2012 Inno Awards. In 2014, Roblox expanded into the mobile space, launching a browser-based version of the platform. Roblox BCO, as the version is called, is made for users on lower-end smartphones. Roblox BCO is
