Early Designs of Life-Size Sex Dolls

In the early days, life-size sex dolls were primarily made from basic materials such as vinyl or rubber. These dolls were often inflatable and lacked any realistic features. Their primary purpose was to provide a physical outlet for sexual desires. However, as societal attitudes towards sexuality began to shift, so did the design of these dolls.

- Inflatable dolls were common in the 1960s and 1970s.
- Materials used were often uncomfortable and lacked durability.
- Realism was not a priority in early designs.

The Rise of Realism in Life-Size Sex Dolls

As technology advanced, manufacturers began to focus on creating more realistic life-size sex dolls. The introduction of silicone and TPE (thermoplastic elastomer) allowed for a more lifelike appearance and feel. These materials mimic human skin, making the dolls more appealing to consumers. But what features have contributed to this rise in realism?

1. Realistic facial features and body proportions.
2. Customizable options for hair, eye color, and skin tone.
3. Articulated joints for more natural poses.
